SUMMARY

- To help the Government of Moldova better understand its options in health reform, and to promote greater consensus among key stakeholders, a two-week study tour to the United States and Canada was organized for seven senior health care officials.

- The purpose was to introduce participants to the main institutions and policies of the American and Canadian health care systems, particularly the similarities and differences with respect to methods/sources of finance, means of allocating resources among providers, and quality assurance.

- The delegation consisted of a Member of Parliament, two heads of departments in the Ministry of Health, and four heads of district hospitals where financing reforms are being tested.

- The delegation visited government health departments, hospitals, insurance companies, a large HMO, and a medical college. In Washington, the delegation met with key U.S. Senate staff, officials from the World Bank, and Moldova's Ambassador to the U.S.

- In comments made informally and in their formal evaluations, the delegation judged the study tour an enormous success. One official from the Ministry of Health said it was the "most organized and professional" activity he had ever been involved in.

- The Tour Leader was impressed with the delegation's seriousness and hard work, and he saw considerable evidence of learning during the program. Specifically, by the end of the program it appeared that each member of the group understood the main advantages and disadvantages of: single payer systems, managed care, fee-for-service and other payment systems (including capitation), and "for-profit" and "not-for-profit" health care providers. The group showed special interest in HMOs and the principles of managed care.

- There was some evidence of disagreement between the Ministry of Health and the Parliament with respect to the extent and scope of the Ministry's legal authority to promote reform, as well as the ultimate goals of and limits to reform, which could be a complicating factor in future reform efforts and foreign assistance.

- The group had numerous suggestions for how future assistance resources could be used to advance health care reforms in Moldova, including management training, help in obtaining information and data, help in obtaining used medical equipment, and technical assistance in designing payment systems and in implementing a managed care experiment.
BACKGROUND AND OBJECTIVES

The Government of Moldova is actively engaged in health care reform, having initiated experiments in health financing in one urban and three rural districts (rayons) beginning January 1, 1995. Still, there continues to be intense debate and considerable indecision and confusion throughout the government and medical profession as to the character, direction and speed of reform. In order to help senior health officials to better understand their options, and in order to promote greater consensus among important governmental and professional stakeholders, the USAID Regional Mission in Kiev proposed a study tour to the United States and Canada for seven key decision makers.

In consultation with USAID and the ZdravReform project office in Kiev, as well as with key officials in the Government of Moldova, it was decided that the study tour should have the following objectives:

• introduce participants to the main institutions, government policies and outcomes of the American and Canadian health care systems;

• examine similarities and differences of these two systems with respect to: (i) methods and sources of health care financing; (ii) means of allocating resources among hospitals, physicians and other health care providers; and (iii) mechanisms for quality assurance;

• examine in detail the advantages/disadvantages of "managed care."

The Participants

The delegation was selected by the Government of Moldova and included representatives from three parts of government that are among the most active in the current health policy debates. Although each member of the delegation was trained as a physician, all now occupy important administrative positions.

The delegation was led by Dr. Vasily Vartic, Member of Parliament and Chairman of the parliamentary Committee on Social and Health Protection and Ecology, which is responsible for drafting all health-related legislation. The delegation also included two senior officials from the Ministry of Health: Dr. Alekseiy Russu, head of the department responsible for the design of health care reforms; and Dr. Boris Goroshenko, head of the departments responsible for supervising medical education, personnel and international relations. The final four members of the delegation consisted of the heads of the district hospitals in the one urban and three rural districts that have been designated as the primary sites for Moldova's health financing experiment.

The delegation was accompanied by Ms. Elena Shapa, Assistant Professor of English at Chisinau State University and local representative of the ZdravReform program in Moldova. As the only English speaker in the group, Ms. Shapa played a crucial role in facilitating the group's international travel and occasionally helped out with interpreting. However, the main purpose for her joining the group was the same as for the rest of the delegation: to gain a fuller understanding of the main features of the U.S. and Canadian health care systems, so as to be better able to support future activities under ZdravReform in Moldova.

The tour was led by Peter Hauslohner, Ph.D., senior political economist and a member of the senior staff at Abt Associates. Mr. Bruno Blumenfeld, a Ph.D. student in history at Columbia University in New York, NY, served as principal interpreter.

A list and short biographies of the study tour participants can be found in Annex A.

The Itinerary

The study tour itinerary can be found in Annex B, and a list of the persons who made presentations or otherwise participated in working meetings with the delegation can be found in Annex C.

Participants' Evaluations

Judging by the group's statements, both formal and informal, and by the behavior of its members, the study tour was an enormous success. The Tour Leader, the interpreter and Ms. Shapa constantly monitored the group's attitudes and reactions to the program, and almost invariably each member of the delegation, whenever asked, expressed great pleasure with virtually everything that happened.

Just as striking as their verbal endorsements was their hard work. Their attention never flagged, even toward the end of eight- and nine-hour days. Their notetaking never stopped, and they always had questions. Even more remarkable, there was no attrition; no member of the group missed, or even was late for, a scheduled meeting or activity.

Near the end of the tour, each member of the group was asked to fill out a questionnaire, evaluating each component of the program, individually, and the program as a whole. The results were extremely heartening. Eight completed questionnaires were returned, and more than 95% of the individual items (275 of 288) received the highest of five possible rankings. The day the group departed the United States, Dr. Russu told the Tour Leader that the program had been the "most organized and professional" activity that he had ever been involved in and would be a "model" that he would try to emulate in his own work in the future.

The English version of the questionnaire, which was administered to the delegation in Russian, can be found in Annex D, together with the numerical results and the translated replies to the open-ended questions that were asked.

Tour Leader's Assessment
The major theme of the U.S. program was, as intended, managed care; while the advantages and disadvantages of a single payer were the major theme of the visit to Canada. In each case, the group quickly grasped the main points. The group showed a special interest in managed care, a topic they hope we will help them to develop further. Managed care—or more specifically the HMO—seemed to them compatible with their present institutions and policies and a good vehicle for rationalizing the allocation of health resources in directions they (and we) would like to go.

Interestingly, the group was not especially impressed with Canada's health system. This may have been partly out of loyalty to their principal hosts (as Americans) and a result of our tendency to try to balance the often very tendentious remarks of the Canadians whenever the latter made explicit US–Canada comparisons. But there appeared to be two more important reasons: a) a widely-shared conviction that Moldova needs to introduce multiple payers, along with limited privatization, precisely in order to increase the total amount of funds available for health care; and b) the vaguely "socialist" tinge of the Canadian system, which the group saw reflected in the seemingly less modern quality of Mount Sinai Hospital (depicted as the "best" hospital in Canada), which was less attractive physically and less well equipped than Albany Medical Center, and in the slower pace of work at Mount Sinai, compared to what they saw in American facilities.

The group quickly understood the importance of competition, but even at the end remained uncertain among precisely which groups or institutions there needs to be competition, or how to promote, ensure, and protect it. Their interest in learning more about payment systems grew over time, at least in part because we hammered into them how important payment and the broader issue of incentives are for efficiency. Thus, the end of the program each member of the group seemed to understood the advantages and disadvantages of fee-for-service and to have a reasonably good comprehension of negotiated fee schedules, prospective payment based on case mix, and capitated payment.

They also departed with a good understanding of the major distinctions between for-profit and not-for-profit organizations, helped greatly by the fact that the Tour Leader presented a separate, 45-minute lecture on the subject (Wednesday morning, June 21).

On several occasions, Dr. Russu and sometimes Dr. Cheobanu attempted to describe the financing experiment that has been started in four rayons. Although these presentations grew more polished over time, it appears the experiment is only now getting organized and has not been particularly well designed or thought out. Apart from giving health care providers more autonomy, patients and physicians more freedom of choice about where to get care or to practice, and local governments more control over health care spending, the centerpiece of the experiment is the establishment of insurance funds similar to those being set up in Russia. The funds are to be fueled by budget contributions, employer payments, and individual patient premiums; and they are to distribute funds among presumably competing service providers. But the emphasis is all on the side of raising more money for health care. The issue of changing payment methods to providers appears not to have been addressed at all.
Finally, it was apparent on several occasions that the Ministry of Health (particularly Dr. Russu) and the Parliament (Dr. Vartic) are not in full agreement as to: i) precisely what authority the Ministry has to organize experiments and to introduce reforms; and ii) what is the legal foundation and main purpose of the health financing experiment now underway. The exact differences were never made clear, and Drs. Russu and Vartic tried to mute their differences and present a united front whenever their hosts and counterparts pressed for more details of the experiment and future of reform. However, they argued frequently enough, and each separately alluded to their differences in side comments, so that disagreement between them was unmistakable and may well be serious.

RECOMMENDATIONS

In a meeting at the offices of Abt Associates, June 28, the group was asked for suggestions as to how the remaining money designated for Moldova might be spent. Following are the group's answers, in the order in which issues were raised.

- management training: courses in business, management, and finance, particularly for persons involved in implementing the financing experiment;

- more information and data: although there's a hunger for everything, the group seemed particularly interested in obtaining samples of legislation, regulations, patient classification systems, insurance company charters, insurance policies, contracts with providers, etc.;

- support in obtaining used medical equipment and technology, and in procuring drugs: the reason given was political—the group said there is a need to demonstrate in a quick and tangible way that reform will benefit people;

- more information about the progress and effects of health care reforms elsewhere, particularly in the NIS: we mentioned the possibility of our holding a regional conference in Almaty in December and that ZdravReform might be able to finance the participation of representatives from Moldova. In addition, Sasha Telyukov gave a quick, impromptu overview of reforms in Russia, Great Britain and the U.S., which the group found very interesting;

- more information about payment methods: we mentioned the workshop on payment methods scheduled for L'viv and the possibility it might be repeated in Odessa (or possibly Kiev) in Russian—which would make it accessible to the Moldovans—and the group expressed interest in attending;

- support for an international conference on health policy and reform, tentatively scheduled for late September in Chisinau: this conference was characterized as very important politically, i.e. as a means of legitimating before a broad domestic audience the kinds of reforms the Ministry of Health is pursuing. Dr. Russu proposed that ZdravReform help finance participation in the conference by both U.S. and other foreign experts, promising that his Ministry would cover all local expenses;

- support specifically in the area of managed care: Dr. Russu and others spontaneously invited Dr. Warren Paley, founder and chairman of Community Health Plan (CHP), the large HMO they spent a full day at in Albany, to come to Moldova in order to help establish a pilot HMO. Paley, who is involved in a similar project in Tula under a small grant issued by the Moscow ZdravReform office, seemed seriously interested. In fact, he may be available to come to Moldova as early as mid-August for a 10-day reconnaissance trip; he suggested the dates, and the Moldovans enthusiastically endorsed them.

The World Bank

On June 29, the group met with Mr. James Q. Harrison, Chief of the Human Resources Division of ECA-IV, the Department at the Bank responsible for the western NIS. Harrison reported that a Bank Director recently returned from a visit to Chisinau, where he found the government somewhat more receptive than previously to a possible social sector project with the Bank. Whereas 18 months earlier, the Ministry of Finance had been firmly opposed to borrowing for health care, this time Finance officials reportedly described health and education as priorities. [NOTE: Dr. Vartic, however, was skeptical of this.] Harrison added that it was premature to discuss concretely the kind of work the Bank might support. But he informed the Tour Leader subsequently that another consulting firm had begun work on a number of health-related topics but had failed to complete the job; and he expressed the hope that USAID and Abt Associates will, at minimum, consult with the Bank on what they decide to do and, if possible, coordinate with, or even complement, things the Bank has done or hopes to do in the future.

Lessons for Future Study Tours

Our experience with this program, when combined with the results of previous study tours, suggest a number of "lessons" that probably should be taken into account in the organization of future tours.

The Tour Leader

Although it is self-serving of the author to make this point, the Tour Leader's role is one of the more important determinants of the program's success. In the best of circumstances and depending on his or her skills and experience, the Tour Leader performs at least four key functions:

- intervenes and guides presentations and discussions in directions that are most helpful to the visitors; prompts presenters to explain or to clarify issues that delegation members do not have the background to fully understand or to put into the proper context;

- teaches—explains further key questions and issues during informal discussions following presentations or at specially-arranged times; and occasionally delivers impromptu lectures as needed (e.g. on the differences between "for-profit" and "not-for-profit" providers);

- supervises and, when necessary, corrects the interpretation of presentations, which some observers believe to be usually the weakest aspect of these programs;

- enhances the credibility and, therefore, the effectiveness of the program, for the group is likely to have greater confidence in what they hear and see if they regard their principal host as a professional of equal stature.

Program Design

The present tour illustrated once again the value of choosing sites away from the Washington, DC area. For one thing, as was the case in the Rada study tour, it proved easier to arrange meetings; and our hosts were for the most part warmer and more interested than many persons in the Washington area who have been inundated with requests for meetings and who have grown perhaps a little jaded as a result.

The decision to spend a full working week in one location (Albany), although dictated by our inability to arrange meetings in Rochester owing to the short notice, turned out to be very positive for reasons we did not fully appreciate at first. Remaining in one place put fewer physical burdens on the group, of course, but also made it easier for the group to concentrate on the substantive program because of the institutional and personal continuity.

In addition, we again learned the value of not over-programming. Much can be "crammed" into the first week of a visit, although it helps to give visiting delegations a day or to overcome their jet lag and to adjust to the very different pace and character of life in U.S. During the second week, however, the pace needs to be slower. There is a limit to the amount of new information than can be absorbed, and the intensity of the first week takes its physical toll. Some in the group become homesick for their families; and even the most serious and dedicated students come to the U.S. with other interests besides the desire for new knowledge. All want to shop, of course, but most also are curious and want to see something of life in the U.S. (where few have been before) and to experience American culture. The decision to bring the delegation to the U.S. at the start of a weekend now seems to us a very good idea.

Value of an Escort from the NIS
The decision to include Elena Shapa likewise proved its value. If nothing else, her help in facilitating the group's travel to and from the U.S. was good for individual and group morale. Typically very few members of these groups speak English (or any other Western language), and not only does this mean a heightened risk of mishaps, it can also mean considerable insecurity, or even fright, on the part of participants. Elena's presence was helpful, but also reassuring, which improved everyone's mood and the group's cohesion.

More importantly, inclusion in the program gave Elena an unparalleled opportunity to forge personal relations with key decision makers in the Government and regions, and this is almost certain to pay big dividends for the ZdravReform program back in Moldova in the future (as we have seen in the case of Lena Truhan in Kiev). Furthermore, it helps the program in myriad ways if our local representative has some understanding of the health system in America, as well as a personal acquaintance with key headquarters staff and an appreciation for our business routines—"the way we do things." Finally, Elena's ability to interpret accurately and effectively for visiting consultants in the future is now incomparably greater than if she had not participated in the program.

Collaboration with Development Associates

The division of labor and cooperation between Abt Associates—which designed the itinerary, organized all substantive business meetings, and made all decisions concerning air travel—and Development Associates—which was responsible for all logistics, ground travel and most of the finances—proved very successful and generated few glitches or complaints along the way. This result was due, we believe, to a very detailed and clearcut delineation of responsibilities at the beginning and to full and reliable communications thereafter.

PARTICIPANTS' EVALUATION OF THE TOUR
(administered 28 June 1995 at Abt Associates)

Please assess the tour you now are completing. The first part of the questionnaire asks about presentations related to health care. The second part asks about logistics and cultural activities. Remember that we will use the information which you provide to improve the design and administration of future study tours; your candid answers and recommendations for improvement are essential.

OPEN-ENDED COMMENTS

What did you like about the tour?

"People are nice and have great respect for their work. I think this problem will be generalized and implemented in our republic. I like the idea that you prove the efficiency of the system by comparing it with other states. I can say with pleasure that your system is the best."

"This is a wonderful program that can be adopted in any part of the world. We will adopt some things in our health reform program."

"We like the organization of all events and all were timely."

"We enjoyed the learning and cultural parts of the program, they were well-balanced. The leader of the program was very attentive. The atmosphere was very friendly and nice. High level of collaboration."

"The program was well thought out. Bravo."

"Appreciate Peter Hauslohner's competence."

What did you dislike about the tour?

"Time flew too quickly."

How could the tour have been improved?

"Begin with a description/explanation of administrative organizations."

"The organization was perfect, hard to say what could be improved."
Which organizations, presenters and places should be included in future tours?

"I liked everything, especially the opera. We realize that Americans not only can work well, but can also have a good time."

"We can note all cultural trips, they were very well organized."

"You can include all organizations."

"The learning part was very important. Include more unofficial meetings."

"Important to include meetings with physicians."

"Would like to know more about folk customs. More unofficial meetings."

"All presenters were very competent."
