Food Security Situation*

- Zimbabwe suffers from widespread food insecurity as a result of several factors, including detrimental government policies and a significant decline in the economy, with low agricultural productivity, high unemployment, and lack of basic services.
- Prices of most basic foodstuffs continue to decline, though they remain beyond the reach of most urban poor households. April monthly allowances for civil servants remained about 77 percent below the cost of the minimum family basket.
- Input shortages and associated high costs are likely to lead to a below-normal 2009 winter wheat season, for which harvests are expected in September-October.
