BOOKS AND REPORTS

About Women and Development: Resource Book. Secretariat for Women in Development, New TransCentury Foundation (1789 Columbia Road, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20009) 1978.

n.p. price: gratis

"This notebook was especially developed for PVOs. It is designed to provide materials...helpful...in planning and implementing development programs involving women." The Resource Book is to be made up of three parts, only two of which are at present ready. The first part is a series of short project profiles based on responses to a questionnaire. These profiles are organized according to type of project: community services; communications; agricultural/rural development; formal and non-formal education; income generation; health, nutrition, fertility, family planning; and research/survey. The second part is a funding bulletin which includes descriptions of U.S. groups and U.N. agencies based in the U.S. which fund development projects. The third part will be a series of case studies.

Agricultural Extension Work Among Rural Women: An Assessment of Staff Training Needs in Selected Developing Countries by Jancis E. Smithells. Agricultural Extension and Rural Development Centre, The University of Reading (London Road, Reading, RG1 5AQ, England, U.K.) March 1972.

32 p. price: 30P (£0.30)

"This paper focuses primarily on the roles and functions, and the training needs of women employed in agricultural extension services in selected developing countries. However, the issues raised would appear to have relevance in many other countries and in a variety of other ministries and their services. This paper is therefore directed to all, especially those in developing countries, who are involved in the planning and execution of programmes which involve women, both as professional workers and as recipients of services."

TAICH has received Volume One of the Proceedings of the International Conference on Women and Food which met in Tucson, Arizona, in January 1978. Volume One includes a summary report and Background Papers; Volume Two gives an overview of the sessions, workshops, volunteered project proposals and additional documents. "The Conference directed its attention to the problems developing countries face as they attempt to provide greater opportunity for all their people to meet the basic needs...and how private and international development organizations can redesign technical assistance so that it is more directly keyed to helping interested countries make food available to hungry and malnourished people; while asking two crucial questions: (1) Does meeting the basic food/nutrition needs of all people have special significance to women, and (2) Is more than an intensification of what is currently being done required?"

This study examines "...what the actual pattern of employment and labour utilization as well as the skill needs and ways of acquiring them are among women in rural communities." Suggestions for the development and utilization of rural "women-power" are based on such patterns. "Adequate knowledge about what the present situation really is and what the tendencies are is essential to working out policies and programmes to bring about changes and improvements which are acceptable to the rural community at large and which are therefore likely to be effective."

"This book is an attempt...in a small way to place on record what the rural women in both Africa and Asia actually do and to suggest means by which they can be helped without changing their present way of life too drastically -- and to their disadvantage. In particular, it endeavors to show how Intermediate Technologies could be of help to them." A list of organizations concerned with intermediate technology and a list of manufactures of some of the equipment suggested in the text are provided as well as a brief bibliography.

"Is there a connection between status and starvation? How can it be that the persons who grow most of the world's food and prepare most of its meals are also most likely to sicken and die from malnutrition? What investment should a caring world make in the lives of those who 'give birth to the future'? Can the world community find a way to distribute its bread fairly while excluding its hungrier half from the decision-making which produces global food policy?" This little book addresses these and other questions and gives practical suggestions for responding to the issues raised.

Women-Headed Households: The Ignored Factor in Development Planning by Mayra Buvinic and Nadia H. Youssef. International Center for Research on Women (2000 P Street, N.W., Suite 403, Washington, D.C. 20036) March 1978.

"The objective of this study is to present a portrayal of women who are heads of household in developing societies as a very special group among the poor worthy of the full attention of policy makers concerned with improving the quality of life of the poorest of the poor." Included in the study is a case-study of female households in the Caribbean, prepared by Barbara Von Elm. This serves two purposes: "First, it provides a model for the kind of data that it is possible to generate on women heads of households by way of national censuses. Second, it presents compelling evidence of the disadvantaged position of women who are heads of household as compared both to the female population in general, and to the population of men who are household heads, in particular."

"A Workshop on Technical Co-operation Among Developing Countries and Women was convened in Tehran from 24-26 April 1978 by the Asian and Pacific Centre for Women and Development...The Workshop was held in the belief that for any developmental strategy to be successful women and their concerns must be fully integrated from the initial formulation through to the eventual implementation. Otherwise each strategy merely creates a new developmental imbalance between women and men, between the rich and the poor." TAICH has received the "Declaration, Statement, Comments, and Report" produced by the Centre for the third Preparatory Committee Meeting for the World Conference on Technical Co-operation Among Developing Countries.

The study on which this book is based was an attempt to analyze the effects of providing good jobs with decent wages to rural women on fertility, role status, and control. The findings of the study suggest that jobs will have little impact unless they are combined with other changes. "The argument... contends that non-agricultural employment that expands the range of economic and social rewards available to women outside the home can promote rural development, raise the status of women, and alter reproductive behavior. Furthermore, programs specifically incorporating women as decision makers and beneficiaries should stimulate more immediate and direct social and economic changes than would similar programs aimed primarily at men. Substantiated by statistical studies and case examples from four South Asian countries -- India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, and Nepal -- the argument has wider practical and theoretical applicability as well."
