FORWARD

Operation Search provides data to help evaluate a crucial concern of the African Graduate Fellowship Program (AFGRAD): The manner and extent to which former AFGRAD participants are contributing to African economic development.

AFGRAD's goal has been to increase the reservoir of high-level African manpower utilized in priority areas of African development. African governments, universities and other nominating bodies have indicated to AFGRAD what are these priorities and nominated individuals to be trained in African universities at the masters and doctoral levels to fill the identified high-level posts. American universities have contributed significantly to the success of the Program, in consort with the Council of Graduate Schools in the United States (CGS) and individually by granting admission with tuition and fee financial support to the qualified candidates. The United States Agency for International Development has granted funds to the African-American Institute (AAI) to meet student costs (other than the tuition and fees provided by the American universities) and to administer and coordinate the entire AFGRAD effort, including contact with African governments, selection, placement, academic and social counselling, financial disbursements, visa sponsorship, and all other details necessary to the management of a successful education training program for African students in American universities.

As an important aspect of its administrative responsibilities, AAI undertook Operation Search in 1975 to provide the AFGRAD sponsoring partners -- African governments, American universities, A.I.D. and A.A.I. -- with information on the current whereabouts and employment of all former AFGRAD participants. Specifically, a list was prepared of all AFGRAD participants from the inception of the program in March, 1963 to June 30, 1974. In all, 913 AFGRAD awards were made during this period; 167 of these grantees, however, were still AFGRAD-sponsored students as of December 31, 1975. This list is organized by country of origin in the first instance, with the countries presented in alphabetical order. For each country, the entries are alphabetized by the students' family name, and the additional information provided includes: Wave (i.e., year of entry -- see Appendix, page 18 for an explanation of the academic years covered by each "Wave"), American university, and field of study. For the 746 students who have completed their studies, information is provided on their degree received and date, and remarks on their whereabouts and employment.

In addition to the 913 awards funded by A.I.D., AFGRAD made 45 grants with student costs funded by donors other than AID; a list of these AFGRAD fellows is provided in Operation Search beginning on page 167.

Given the dimensions of the AFGRAD program, the difficulty of tracking peoples' whereabouts, the mobility with which individuals change employment in Africa, and AAI's very limited resources from this purpose, Operation Search nevertheless provides sufficiently comprehensive, correct data to summarize the important impact of AFGRAD in contributing to African high-level manpower needs and in providing data from which conclusions about AFGRAD's effectiveness might be drawn.

For the reader's benefit certain statistical summaries and additional compilations are included to supplement the Operation Search country-by-country, student-by-student listings. Please see the Table of Contents.

It is the view of the African-American Institute that Operation Search further substantiates the conclusion that AFGRAD has been extraordinarily successful in (a) selecting highly qualified African participants who (b) overall have completed their post-graduate programs in American universities in a comparatively short time with (c) an outstanding rate of academic success, and have (d) then returned to Africa to (e) assume important roles in the task of African development. AFGRAD's record speaks for itself, as Operation Search testifies.
